Fordham University School of Law opened its doors on September 28, 1905. It was not until the fall of 1914, however, that the school was “financially strong enough to launch the Fordham Law Review.”

As one of the first dozen law reviews in the country, the Fordham Law Review had a modest beginning. Published in The Fordham Monthly, Volume I was about fifty pages long. Students wrote book reviews and summaries of recent court decisions on legal issues such as whether a Christian scientist who treated patients through prayer had practiced medicine without a license (he had) and whether a criminal defendant was liable for murder though his pregnant victim only died later from subpar hospital care (he was). Volumes II and III tripled in size and began publishing articles, while still “advertis[ing] such marginally legal items as Tuval’s Havana Cigars and Kich’s French Bread.” The Law Review’s early articles and notes were typically no more than seven pages in length. Footnotes ran into the dozens, not the hundreds. The early volumes cost $1 per year.

With the advent of the First World War, the young Law Review ceased publishing after just three volumes. Despite the Great Depression, it was revived in expanded form in 1935. In the first pages of Volume IV, the Law Review reemerged by publishing Why Law School Reviews?: A Symposium. New York Court of Appeals Chief Judge Frederick Evan

---

3. KACZOROWSKI, supra note 1, at 76.
6. See Comment, 1 FORDHAM L. REV. 183 (1914); see also KACZOROWSKI, supra note 1, at 76.
7. See Comment, 1 FORDHAM L. REV. 365 (1914); see also KACZOROWSKI, supra note 1, at 76.
8. Hanlon, supra note 2, at xviii.
Crane began the symposium by noting the emerging vitality and relevance of law school journals:

In some such ways the law school [review] has slowly and gradually developed into one of the chief functions of our law schools and has become so important and useful that its weight and authority find influence outside the scholastic atmosphere with the practicing lawyer as well as the judges in our courts.10

These words are still true today, particularly when tracing the growth of the Fordham Law Review. Just five years after returning from its long hiatus, the Law Review was producing material that was cited by the U.S. Supreme Court.11 A student comment published in 1978 formed the basis for enterprise liability in tort law12 and remains a well-known example of courts citing to student works.13 The Fordham Law Review is currently the fourteenth most cited law journal overall as well as the ninth most cited by state and federal courts and the fifth most cited by other legal journals.14

John D. Feerick, who served as an editor-in-chief of the Fordham Law Review and later dean of Fordham Law School, noted: “The success of the Fordham Law Review is due to the many hundreds of men and women who have served with distinction on its staff. Many former staff members are now prominent judges, teachers, practicing lawyers, and public servants.”15

In this centennial edition, the Board of Editors for Volume 83 would like to thank the former editors and staff of the Fordham Law Review. Our work is possible because of the century-long tradition of excellence achieved through your service.

THE EDITORS

13. Bert Sloan, Note, What Are We Writing for? Student Works As Authority and Their Citation by the Federal Bench, 61 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 221, 227 n.38 (1992).
15. Feerick, supra note 5, at 86.
To commemorate our founding in 1914, the Board of Editors has selected six influential pieces published by the Law Review over the past 100 years and will republish one piece in each issue.

The second piece selected by the Board is the testimony of Ignatius M. Wilkinson, the fourth and longest-serving dean of Fordham Law School (1923–1954), to the Judicial Committee of the U.S. Senate. Speaking to the Committee on the Judiciary, Wilkinson criticized the Franklin D. Roosevelt Judiciary Reorganization Bill of 1937 because it would “undermine the independence of the courts” and “shake[] the foundations of our constitutional structure.”

Wilkinson’s testimony appeared in the May 1937 edition of the Fordham Law Review, only two years after the Law Review resumed printing. The publication of Wilkinson’s testimony shows the Law Review’s enduring commitment to promoting the public debate.

*   *   *